

Chess Pieces by John Waterhouse
At Salford Arts Theatre
Reviewed by Kritsanu Belt □ October 2013

Chess Pieces is a musical comedy with an intriguing title and tagline, suggesting a hidden manipulation of us all as players in the complex and intricate game of life. Though as individuals we tend to think of ourselves autonomous and able to determine our own future, as citizens in wider society we feel constrained and jostled by forces seemingly

beyond our control

, and Chess Pieces makes compelling use of that tension.

This duality is played out in front of us, quite literally, as each chess piece in the game is sent into the game of life by two controlling agents, more like puppeteers than Grand Masters, as they objectify the personalities on parade . The audience though, get to see the human characters being manipulated on stage the super-human or other-worldly characters that manipulate them, as a teasing out of whether we could ever truly know the forces that shape our destiny.

and

The play opens with the actors and dancers performing a song that delivers a well choreographed dance scene, grabbing the audience's attention immediately. Furthermore the use of dry ice enhances a sense of mystery and a chilling presence or foreboding as the devils arrive. The producer had obviously put a lot of thought to designing the detail of the stage as the floor and wall were laid out in black and white to represent a chess board. This helped to create the sense of each character lacking autonomy over themselves or their surroundings, and at the beck and call of the mastermind devils,

Sanctimus

and

Angelo

lurking in the background.

As Sanctimus and Angelo arrived on stage, they started their conversation straight away about the human lives they have been taking, and what social class they were from, which seem to be a daily routine for them as they talk about it very casually and leisurely which is every interesting as this scene seems to suggest human nowadays committed so many variety of sins and crime to an extent, it has become a normal topic to talk in hell. This of course is aim at the audiences, as cogitation arises from the audiences mind whether the action they committed lately is considered as a "sin". The fact that all these human that committed a sins and have their lives taken by the devils, are all from different social class reinforce the idea that no one is save from the grasp of "devils".

After the devils finished their conversation about the human lives they have been taken, Sanctimus, played by Stacy Coleman suggest to Angelo, played by Peter Wood that they play a "hell chess game", using human on earth as pieces in which Angelo pleasurely agree. Human lives here are portray nothing than a mere "pawns" at the mercy of undetectable forces that pulled their strings. Moreover this scene reflects on modern human society, the danger of not being able to realise that we are in a game are used by others for their own benefit. Stacy Coleman and Peter Wood both delivered their lines very confidently and even though their role were "devil", the conversation they have were very "humanised" in a way that people from everyday lives could relate to, including the audiences.

The "devils" in the play could be interpreted in two ways, the one that cunningly and heinously manipulate the human and uses them of their own benefit and fun, which could actually be other human on earth itself, or the "inner internal" devils that reside in all of us and its tempting power of lust, desire, greed, pride and anger which could overpower us, if not controlled. It is quite disturbing to observe characters on stage, innocently being controlled by the devils behind them but it is quite also humorous as audience are drawn in this feeling of uncertainty of what will the devils make the human do or commit. Again these interpretations are left for the audiences to decide but undoubtedly it is a very special scene indeed as it makes me to try to penetrate the real meaning of the play.

Angelo wasted no time to introduce his "King", Giles Newsome a British politician hoping to become a prime minister one day through eliminating his opponent, here played by Andrew Marsden a politician who is currently having an affair with a beautiful but rather un-intelligent pop star called Ruby Ellerman, here played by Daisy Leigh, who is Angelo's "Queen" that is currently living in a lofty world of super star hoping that she will become more famous and gain more recognition around the world. Similarly, both of them have great ambition and will go in great lengths to achieve it. Already we are introduced to the concept of "lust" and "adultery" as these two characters interact with each other on the bed, the scene is however not too explicit and is actually done in a comedic way with these two singing together doing their little dance on the bed. Angelo here in this scene had taken advantage of human nature of "lust", and believed that nothing could possibly stand in their way toward their goals.

The versatility of the stage is greatly highlighted in this scene as four chairs, one plank of wood and one blanket can be rapidly turned into a bed in a matter of time. Obviously the actress, Daisy Leigh has experience in singing as she sang very sanguinely with Andrew Marsden and it is quite impressive to know that she graduated from Birmingham School of Acting this year and her skill at singing is shown clearly throughout the play. Giles Newsome on the other hand has been acting since 2012 in numerous short films such as Speed dating and The Other side. He had has his education in University of Reading and Stirling Academy and his skill in acting is clearly shown through out the play as he switch his character from Andrew Marsden to a civil servant, Anthony Crown-Derby and act so well I felt I was watching another complete actor acting.

It is interesting to see how the movement of actor and actress stopped and the brightness of the light are lowered at the foreground where the human chess pieces are when in the background there is an increase in intensity of the fiery red light illuminating on Sanctimus and Angelo as they start talking about which pieces they should move next. Through this process the play reinforce the presence of the devils and remind the audiences always that it is them that is in control of the whole events and action.

Furthermore the lighting effect on the stage is very interesting and important. Angelo and Sanctimus are always illuminated by a red fiery light in the background with its intensity varying throughout the play, the human chess pieces on earth however are instead illuminated by a pure white light in the foreground. The colour of the light are done on purpose as red represent evilness, blood, the devils and hell while white represent the innocents nature of the human soul. With the use of light in the background and the foreground, audience are able to differentiate the bad and the good force and make a judgement that it is not the human fault for committing all these sins but rather the red devils in the background that is corrupting the human soul. All little detail such as the light and the colour of the stage contribute a lot to the play itself and show a huge great amount of effort production team puts in to the musical.

As the play goes on more chess pieces start to enter the game, this time Sanctimus make her move and move in her Queen, Harriet Posonby a lawyer played by Gemma Byrne, to break into the room in which Giles Newsom and Ruby Ellerman were having an affair. This of course anger Angelo very much and put Niles into a worrying position as his affair is now known to Harriet and importantly she now have him under her grasp, to be more precise Sanctimus has Angelo's King under pressure. Ruby Ellerman provide a sustainable amount of comedic relief for the audiences as she talk in an idiotic super star style. I believe in this scene, the concept "lust of power" is convey through Harriet action of blackmailing Niles, furthermore this scene also bring out the issue of corruption in politics in modern society.

With the queen now sent, Sanctimus also sent in the King which is Terry Cross, a chat show host, played by Tony Charnock. I personally have to say, he is one of the best comedic characters in the musical as I find his interpretation of chat show host extremely ridiculously funny. His movement, his accent and his delivered dialogue are so pack and stuffed in humorous nature that I just kept laughing whenever he deliver his lines!, personally for me he did a great job at parodying media nowadays. Tony Charnok had a lot of experience in acting and have been doing it since 2011, an example of his movie is call "All The Way Home". In this scene Angelo's queen Ruby was being interview by Terry, which unknown to both of them Angelo commanded Ruby to spill out embarrassing account of Terry at a party. This scene portrays how powerful media can play a major role in society as Terry face became more and more agitated as Ruby continued talking. In a way it show how media become such a powerful force that we human being often felt embarrass and guilty to reveal our inner self.

More pieces are constantly reveal as the play goes, this include the Knight, Sir James Tetley, a newspaper proprietor, played by David Hynes and the Bishop, Melvyn Sachs, a Financier, all these chess pieces sent by Angelo to help Niles accomplish his dream of becoming the prime minister in their own way. Again this scene raise a concerning issue how media and economy nowadays are closely link to politics that to an extent that they corrupt each other like a roots that vigorously clench on to the ground tenaciously. Their actions of course are intercept by Sanctimus's Kinght and Rook which are Jade Thompson, a sport women (played by Gemma Byrne) and Antony Crown-Derby, a civil servant (played by Andrew Marsden). Again the variety of different people from different social class used in this game again reinforce the idea of how no one is save from the influence and the manipulated power of the devils.

Eventually chess pieces start to get destroyed in the end, for example Terry Cross and Jade Thompson are defamed by Sir James Tetley and Melvyn Sachs. Terry Cross is defamed by the newspaper as they present his embarrassing pictures from parties mentioned by Ruby and Melvyn is defamed for using a special drug to earn medals at the Olympic. I find every scene where chess pieces are destroyed by others very interesting as for me it seems to reflect on the cruel nature of modern human society in which we constantly are unaware what our actions lead to or the effect it has on others around us just like how the human chess pieces destroy each other, not knowing it was all the work of the devils. Surprisingly even at the end the devils lost control of their pieces and pieces, even though on the same team come to a disagreement and split apart from each other like Niles and Ruby at the end. Niles no longer wants to be a politician but instead a nurse much to the displeasure of Angelo and Ruby herself. For me this is one of the powerful scenes that suggests that human beings will never be truly happy if they are free of everything and embrace freedom to the fullest and if "devils" are real then indeed "freedom" must be God's greatest gift.

I find it very entertaining when at a certain time a dancer on stage will perform their choreographed dance as this breaks up the sequence of serious and dramatic feeling in the musical and provides a comedic relief for the audiences. It is quite amazing to know that these dancers trained by Megan Elliott were not originally part of the play itself and John Waterhouse has only asked them to be incorporated into his musical a week before the play!. There were some minor flaws throughout the musical but overall they were great and contribute a big part to the success of the play.

I personally enjoy the play very much, its cast, its setting and its plot. I felt that every event that was part of the play hid a moral lesson to teach the audience about modern human society. The fact that there are no huge developments in any main characters, I think was done on purpose to represent that if we are all vulnerable to being controlled or manipulated by someone, none of us deserve any more attention or sympathies than others. Which then leads to what I think was the important message of the play, which is that we must be more aware of the actions we commit and even more aware if we somehow are being controlled, influenced or manipulated to commit those actions as it is only "freedom", that should control you and influence you, after all it is a God gift.