

There's art in them there hills

May 2014

James Heartfield , Ann Jackson and John Siddique explored why visual and literary art is so popular in the hills of the Pennines, chaired by Pauline Hadaway

The Pennines have long been an alluring part of the world, both for industrialists utilising its natural resources and the workers in those industries escaping their factory life to enjoy the open and grand countryside. Developments in our technological infrastructure, particularly in the generation and distribution of electricity for power, has resulted in post war economic growth taking place in towns and cities rather than the countryside. There seems to have been something of a counter movement of preference by some for living in the urban countryside, particularly by artists, resulting in places like Hebden Bridge getting national recognition as a ural hotspot cult

Some background readings

Origins of Creative Industries Policy in The Creative Industries by Terry Flew 19 April 2011

Clare Allan: Burnt Wood and Paper at The Portico , reviewed by Simon Belt, Manchester Salon November 2012

The Creativity Gap , by James Heartfield

The sacred in art is about more than religion , by Kenan Malik, Guardian 18 March 2014

David on whether London is overrated as a place for artists , by Dave Bowden, IdeasTap 2 April 2014

Watch video of the speaker and audience comments below. Thanks to Dan Clayton the documentary filmmaker from Leeds for this.

Sponsored by

This discussion was kindly sponsored by Kinder Kitchens, a kitchen design company with their showroom on Albion Road, New Mills, Derbyshire. The Kinder Kitchen showroom has several kitchen displays showing both contemporary and traditional themes as well as a range of worktops including granite, solid wood and laminate. These kitchens show some bespoke hand-made features that make their kitchen displays unique.